A Covenant of God

by Scott Sides

The first explicit reference to God’s covenant with Abraham is in Genesis 15. When the Lord called the 75-year-old Abram (as he was first called) to leave his home city of Ur and set out on a journey, a relationship already existed between God and Abram. In that relationship, which enabled God to command Abram’s obedience, God made certain promises to him: “I will make of you a great nation, and I will bless you, and make your name great, so that you will be a blessing” (Gn 12:2, 1 RSV).

Formal establishment of the covenant with Abram is described in Genesis 15 as a profound religious experience. The initiative lay entirely with God, who approached Abram in a vision and spoke with him. Abram raised a fundamental objection: how could he experience the blessing of God if it was to come to him through a son he did not have? His wife Sarai was past the childbearing age, and he himself was “as good as dead” (Rom 4:19). God assured the old man that he would have a son through whom his descendants would eventually be as numerous as the stars of heaven. Abram’s belief at that point introduced the theme of righteousness central to the covenant concept: Abram “believed the LORD, and he reckoned it to him as righteousness” (Gn 15:6, RSV). At the end of that day, Abram knew that his own future and the future of his descendants were firmly in the hands of the covenant God. “On that day the LORD made a covenant with Abram, saying, ‘To your descendants I give this land’” (v 18, RSV).

The covenant is more fully expressed in Genesis 17, which probably records a renewal of God’s covenant with Abram. The initiative once again lay with God (Gn 17:1). God addressed the 99-year-old Abram in words that made clear that the covenant was not a relationship between equal partners. God was the Almighty; Abram was a human being to whom an extraordinary privilege had been granted.

Yet the details of the covenant in Genesis 17 show that both partners assumed responsibilities. God committed himself voluntarily to Abram and his descendants while requiring certain commitments from Abram. The blessing Abram would receive as a covenant partner became clear from the new name God gave him. “I am changing your name. It will no longer be Abram; now you will be known as Abraham, for you will be the father of many nations” (Gn 17:5, 2 NLT).

In Acts 3:25, Peter quotes Genesis 22:18, and goes on to tell us that the covenant promise God made to Abraham was fulfilled in the Servant God raised up (Jesus) by “blessing us in turning each of you from your wicked ways.” God is a covenant God who wants to bless all men through his Son, Jesus Christ. God made a covenant with Abraham and then went about fulfilling that covenant over hundreds of years. His is still fulfilling that covenant (“I will bless all nations through your seed.”) every time a sinner is washed by the blood of Jesus. That blessing is available to all. Have you been washed in his blood?

Keep in your prayers.
